New Insurance CE Course Alert: “Directors and Officers Liability”

Examines how actions of senior management can leave a corporation liable

Who can forget the Enron fiasco? It put the spotlight on how the behavior of directors and officers can affect a corporation’s liability. CEU.com’s new course, “Directors and Officers Liability,” covers corporate rights and legal responsibilities, and also identifies and explains Federal and State laws that create liability risks for directors and officers of organization.

This course reviews the duties and responsibilities of officers and directors along with the “business judgment rule.” Specific D&O liability claim categories are covered for a variety of exposure areas (strategic planning, E&O, environmental, products, ERISA, EPL, intellectual property rights, etc.).

It also covers the investor protections provided by SEC regulations, as well as U.S. federal law governing financial and managerial reporting requirements. Corporate governance issues are reviewed in relation to the legal and ethical responsibilities of directors and officers as they manage their organizations.

Who needs this information?

This in-depth course is ideally suited for property/casualty agent/brokers and insurance agency staff active in the commercial area. It would also be suitable for property/casualty underwriters, risk managers, chief risk officers, chief executive officers, and chief financial officers. Board members will be interested in this information, as well business owners responsible for reporting to a board of directors of any size organization.

More information about this course can be found at www.ceu.com.
